differences in the effect of parental education on health-related quality of life of Korean youths. The purpose of this study was to examine sex differences in the effect of parental education on health-related quality of life (HRQOL) among Korean youths. Data were from the 4th Korea Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance. A total of 7,884 high school students (3,904 boys and 3,980 girls) were included in this study. The HRQOL index was measured using a questionnaire, and the items for the HRQOL index were based on the Korean version of the Pediatric Quality of Life Inventory. Generalized estimating equations with Poisson distribution were used to examine sex differences in the effect 570a42141b
