Confusing colors If you're not careful and/or careful enough, you can unintentionally change the colors in an image. Here are some ways that colors can get muddled:

- Red: Lightening a red image can often cause a black image to look blue, as red is the complement of blue and adding light to the red portion (if the color is simply lightened, the color change can be taken care of in the image's Curves panel).
- Green: Lightening a green image can often cause a black image to look purplish, as green is the complement of yellow and adding light to the green portion (again, the color change can be taken care of in Curves).
- Blue: Darkening a blue image can often cause a black image to look magenta, as blue is the complement of magenta and adding dark to the blue portion.

Taking a Screenshot Adobe Lightroom is a powerful program that offers a lot of great features and capabilities. It's also one of the most complex programs. One of its greatest features is the ability to add a "screenshot" to a photo (the reason it's called "screenshot" is because an image of a monitor screen can be a simple composite of its contents). This simple procedure is available for those who use Lightroom. It's especially useful for those who

[Study on the volatile components of stem bark of the fruit of Kaempferia parviflora by GC-MS]. To analyze the volatile components from the stem bark of the fruit of Kaempferia parviflora. The volatile compounds in the stem bark of the fruit of K. parviflora were analyzed by GC-MS, and the identification was carried out by mass spectrometry and NIST database. Thirty-three volatile compounds were identified, and the major volatile components were carvacrol, borneol, alpha-terpinen-7-ol, phytol, 2-methyl-6-methoxy-4-methylene-3(2H)-naphthalenone, cis-beta-caryophyllene, beta-elemene, eudesmol, P-fenchone. The results provided a basis for quality evaluation and comprehensive utilization of K. parviflora. Criminals target the weakest, most vulnerable people, using "normal" business transactions to launder cash and money for their illegal activities. Example: A known money launderer runs a cash business that is solvent but not profitable. He deposits checks and checks that are in checks in amounts less than $10,000. The launderer makes no profit, but as long as there are lots of small transactions in lots of locations, it won't look suspicious. Note that this is NOT an investment business. The launderer's interest isn't in making money, but is in hiding and disguising the source of the cash that he's receiving. Criminal activities that can be laundered include large-scale drug sales, firearms and stolen goods, and extortion. Wash Cycle: A launderer will establish a number of different businesses to avoid attention from investigators. The launderer will split his proceeds from one crime between two or more legitimate businesses. Some criminal activity will pay for legitimate business activity. For example, when a criminal organization wants to move drugs, the money goes into a legitimate business where they can purchase vehicles or other equipment to move the drugs to market. The money is then laundered back into drug trafficking. Create Fictitious Businesses Every business needs to stay in business to make money, and many businesses borrow money they can't pay back. The business may run out of money at any time, and the owner has to borrow more. The owner can

Q: Is there a simpler alternative to Rails 4.1 'resources' for RESTful APIs? I'm learning Ruby on Rails 4.1 and I really like the way resources are supposed to simplify my code and make RESTful APIs more readily understandable by end users. However, since resources seem to replace 'wrap up everything in a class' and both methods and controllers were then handled by a single class, I'm trying to find a simpler way to achieve the same outcome. I've tried looking for inspiration in the Rails source to see if it could point me in the right direction but all I've been able to find is `Rails::Helpers::ClassMethods` but that didn't seem to provide the 'wrap up everything in a class' effect. So, is there a simpler way to do this? A: As I read it, the various ways are not really meant to replace each other. In the old days (long before Rails 4.1 was released) the pretty standard way to do this was to put all the CRUD operations into separate Controller classes. You would then access them with nested routes (e.g. get, create, update, delete) As you know, resources was really meant to speed up single-page apps. If you're developing a Rails 4.1 app (or your are using a front-end framework for building an SPA) using resources can be convenient. For example, if you have a page with a table of data in it, you can have each row inside a contain an tag that points to a resource that may be filtered or sorted, etc.
