Differences between the in vitro growth responses of murine cells bearing tumourigenic and non-tumourigenic transplantable tumours to human lymphokines were studied. The data indicate that antilymphokine antibodies are of value in experiments designed to reveal the effects of lymphokines on cell growth and differentiation. The tumours used for the study were transformed with Epstein-Barr virus (EBV) and transformed non-tumourigenic clone 5 cells in athymic (nu/nu) mice can be induced to a prolonged survival by tumour-conditioned medium and by human recombinant interleukin-1 (rIL-1). The fact that both potent and weak antilymphokine antibodies can abolish the antitumour effects of rIL-1 indicates that human interleukin-1 can act on tumour-transformed cells by mechanisms other than the induction of lymphokine production. The tumourigenic tumour clone 8 cells grow very poorly in vivo but in vitro respond well to conditioned media from different human tissues and lymphokines. The results suggest that tumour
