Therefore, the correct position of the catheter was confirmed through the exploration. In addition, since the stone had not been sufficiently removed, this would have had a negative effect on the recurrence of the cyst. For this reason, cyst exploration was selected to remove the stone. Urethral catheterization prior to cyst exploration led to the appropriate position of the urethral catheter. The treatment options for urethral stone include local mass extraction, cyst litholapaxy, cystotomy, laser lithotripsy and urethral dilatation.\[[@ref5][@ref6]\] Benign prostatic hypertrophy (BPH) is a common entity among men aged 50 and older, and it is the most prevalent and treatable health problem in elderly male. The prevalence of benign prostatic hypertrophy increases with age and can cause urethral stricture.\[[@ref7]\] The incidence of urethral stricture is reported to be 5-20%.\[[@ref8]\] When the urethral stricture is accompanied with hydronephrosis, it may become complicated, and the management of urethral stricture is more difficult. Urethral stricture may be treated with internal urethrotomy (IU) or dilatation. Urethral stricture accompanied by hydronephrosis may be treated with direct internal urethrotomy, but the results may vary because the risk of urethral perforation is increased with IU.\[[@ref9]\] Therefore, the removal of the stone accompanying urethral stricture is recommended. Normally, cystolithotomy is a standard treatment method for complete removal of a urethral stone. However, the anterior urethra is difficult to approach due to the presence of the urethra 6d1f23a050
